Question 16

Explain why a vector cannot have a component greater than its own magnitude.

Solution

A vector can't have a component greater than its own magnitude because the magnitude is obtained by squaring the components, adding them all together, and taking the square root.